

There is no principled reason for denying an employee a seat when he spends a substantial part of his workday at a single location performing tasks that could reasonably be done while seated, merely because his job duties include other tasks that must be done standing.

Justice Carol A. Corrigan
California Supreme Court
2016 case about CVS and
JP Morgan Chase tellers in California